

Meet your information needs by:

Doing your own computer search

Find out where to take a basic computer searching course which teaches you to use your own personal computer to search the National Library of Medicine's health sciences databases in order to retrieve literature citations and abstracts.

Consulting journal articles or books

Find the journal articles and books you need at health sciences libraries in your geographic area.

Using library services

Consult a health sciences library in your geographic area for general reference, computer searches, and other information services. Major medical research libraries in your geographic vicinity can provide you with additional support.

(Fees will vary for these services. Some restrictions may apply.)
